A CHANCERY PRISONER. The turnkey led the way in silence, and gently rusing the litch of the room door, mothered Mr. Pickwick to enter. It was a large, bare, desolate room, with a number of stump bedsteads made of iron, on one of which lay stretced the shadow of a man, wan, pale, and ghasily. His breathing was hard and thick, and he morned painfully as it came and went. At the bedside sat a short old man in a cobler's apron, who by the aid of a pair of horn spectacles, was reading from the bible aloud... it was the fortunale legatee The sick man haid his hand upon his attend-ant's arm, and motioned him to stop. He clused the book and laid it on the bed " Open the window," said the sick man.

He did so. The noise of carriages and carts, the rattle of wheels, the cries of men and boys nil the busy sounds of a mighty multitude instinct with life and occupation, blended into one deep murmur, floated into the room. Above the hourse louid hum arose from time to time a misterms laugh, or a scrap of some jungling war, shouted forth by one of ام/منسيسال would strike upon the ear for an instant, and then be lost amidst the roar of voices and the trains of footsteps. These are metancholy sounds to a quiet listener at any time, but how melancholy to the watcher by the bed of death!

"There is nu air here," said the sick man faintly. "The place pollutes it; it was fresh round about when I walked there years ago, but it grows but and heavy in passing these walls. A cannot breath it."
"We have breathed it together a long time,"

said the old man. ' Come, come.

There was a short silence, during which the two spectators approached the bed. The sick man drew a hand of his old fellow prisoner towards him, and pressing it affectionately between both his own, retained it in his grasp. "Thope," he gasped after a while, so faintly that they bent their ears close over the bed to cutch the half-formed sounds his cold lips gave vent to. I hope my merciful Judge will bear in mind my beavy punishment on earth. Deservedly the most popular remedy ever known in EGERABLE PULMONARY HAL-SAM. The following recommendation is from Dr. Jacob Mycm:

Patract of a letter from Dr. Jacob Myers. "The Vegetable Pulmonary Balsam bas been sold in this country for two years, and the medicine has gained an uncommon celebrity, for it scarcely in one instance tailed of justing the desired effect. I am by no mount in favor of the many nostrums, Those connected with schools, ar interested in most of which are impositions upon a credulous public, but that which I know by experience to be effectual, I cannot help but give my approbation thereto. A counterfeit preparation has been offered here by a trat elling agent of Comstock, N. Y., and there is also another princie vended here that isstrongly suspected to be sparious.
